

Interquartile range represents the difference between the upper (or third) quartile and the lower (or first) quartile. It is the range of values represented by the middle 50 percent of a data set. It is also called the midspread. The smaller the interquartile range, the tighter that the middle 50% of the data is clustered around the median.